

Case: Time Critical Service of Process

Their marriage was heading for divorce. The couple held significant assets in two neighboring counties. Each party felt their self interests would be better served by establishing legal venue in one county over the other. We were retained to serve the husband and thereby establish venue in the wife's preferred county.

We followed the husband from his place of employment and established his new residence in a tightly secured apartment complex. Next, we identified a female visitor as his co-worker and new girlfriend.

One afternoon we followed the girlfriend from the apartment complex back to their place of employment. The couple then sped from the office into a downtown district to what they hoped would become a taxi ride to the airport and a period of "lying low" until they received word his wife had been served. Much to the husband's chagrin, he was successfully served as he stood curbside with luggage, awaiting the taxi.
